Weighing in on “the confusion,” Moore pointed out that he believes the president’s efforts to legalize “Dreamers” and certain illegal immigrants are a departure from the positions of conservatives, including the Tea Party movement. “This issue of illegal immigration and the president saying that he wants to negotiate about [it] with Democrats, we think is — and I think a lot of conservatives will think this — a very, very big departure from the conservative principles and the conservative base,” Moore said. The former judge was a Republican candidate for U.S. Senate in Alabama in 2010, but lost the primary. “I think he ran this campaign the wrong way,” he said. “I think he ran it without this kind of intense conservatism and without the leadership of the Tea Party.” Moore also discussed his thoughts on his failed 2012 Senate campaign against Sen. Doug Jones (D-Ala.). “I know the dynamics of the Senate very, very well. I have dealt with it for years,” Moore said. “So I know what is required and I have seen how this system works. And so I know that this race that was a very close one was the closest thing you can get to an open seat,” he continued. “And I know that all of the money and all of the organizing that we had in that race was taken from Jones. And I don’t know what we would have done in that race if we had not been taken from under the nose of the Democrat Party.”
