The technical team first started developing “HyperMotion Technology” in the spring of 2015 and created prototypes. Subsequently, the team worked to fine-tune the technology and continue updating it to ensure the desired effects could be achieved. The team used the UEFA Champions League Final, played in Berlin in June 2015, to test the technology. The resulting data was analyzed by the technical team, and the new technology was integrated into FIFA. “We’re pleased to see our work come to life,” said Sam Mayer, lead game designer on FIFA. “The technology provides players with more control over the gameplay, and we hope this improved experience will allow them to demonstrate their skills in more depth and achieve more satisfying scores. Unlike previous versions of FIFA, there are no limitations on which teams and competitions a player can control. Players can choose to control any team, any competition or no competition at all. For example, players can start by controlling a player (such as Cristiano Ronaldo) from a team that they are familiar with and then, during gameplay, direct that player to control a team or players from a different competition. Players can also create custom competitions with custom rules that they select at the start of the game. In addition to having complete control over teams and competitions, players can now create custom tactics and formations. To create a tactic, a player taps on the “Manage Tactic” button to access the “Tactic Builder.” In the “Tactic Builder,” a player can browse through all the available options and select which of those options they would like to use for their tactics, including teams, competitions and players. Once the player is happy with their selection, the tactical lineup can be saved. A tactic includes the lineup of players, formations, positioning, kits and other visual elements, as well as unique rules based on how the player wants the match to be played. For example, the player can decide to have a set of players that perform well on the breakaway, another squad that focuses on playing keep away and attacking moves from the front or the squad that looks to make attacking moves from distance. The tactics system has been designed to give the player a more realistic and intuitive approach to their gameplay. “Our goal has been to provide a deep level of customisation to player gameplay by allowing the player to create their own tactics,” said Mayer. “HyperMotion
