While gathering information about your host a program might try to act as if it is part of the kernel, but in that case it will have to pretend to be an operating system already loaded and running. First step is to run a simple program that prints a welcome message, write a simple program to execute that program. You may have already figured this out, but the simple program might be a simple C program that prints a welcome message, for example: Next, you should try to write a program that tries to read from stdin a line that contains a file name, then runs that file. Now, what happens if you run this C program? You may be familiar with the concept of "shellshock" - where it is possible to execute code as part of a shell command, or inside an existing program (such as the system call `execvp` which indicates the program that should execute the shell command). Shellshock Shellshock is a bug in the bash command shell which allows the execution of code inside the shell, or code sent through a pipe. Various people have reported being able to determine the current process by looking at the owner

The New Hampshire State Police announced Tuesday that it has been notified of alleged mail theft at all eight post offices in the state. Officers said a majority of the thefts are committed by the same person and a majority of the items are white envelopes and packages that contain checks or bank statements. Authorities said the thieves have been intercepting mail being transported through the post offices in Manchester, Concord, Portsmouth, Lebanon, N.H., Manchester, Concord and Dover. A person who received stolen mail reported the crime on Monday and officers later recovered a lot of mail that was missing when they checked it. Authorities are warning people to report mail theft immediately and avoid opening mail. They also urged people to call their local police department if they believe they have received mail that was stolen.
